Fuel filter is tucked underneath below the right rear passenger (U.S. vehicle) door. At least on mine, there is an aero plastic panel that completely conceals it. As with my differential service, I still had the car on the ramps so proceeded to do this. A bunch of 10mm fasteners and a few snap clips hold it. All reusable if careful; just took a nut driver and small screwdriver to free the snap clips. Im sure it depends from the year of the car. In my case 2007 D3 it is a plastic holder and metal bolt. So, I cannot imagine the situation when you need to cut it. Even if it will be much rusted it should easy go out of there. At least in my case it was not rusted and I didnt apply any force. It was very easy to pull it off. Also, I didnt apply too much force when I put it back. They are trying to charge 116.75 for fuel filter is it me thinking of old times or are fuel filters really this much. I thought they would be around 40 quid tops. 116. Mercedes Benz W220 Class S 400 CDI (2002) vs Audi A8 (D3) 4.0 TDI V8 Quattro (2003). I'm quite heavy footed but the 4.2 regularly returned 500 miles per tank. In 4+ years of A8 ownership the only thing I've paid for is a set of front brakes on the 4.2 Tdi. I have had a 5.0L V8 M5 and also the 3.8 earlier M5 (S6) and both were low 20s (well the V8 M5 was 19-20 MPG). It has been serviced (although not fully, by the look of the book) on longlife servicing at Audi every time. It went about 40k without a service at one stage! The car is damaged, but it's purely cosmetic. I'm potentially considering buying a used A8 (D3 facelift, without the new Audi family "mouth") and wondered how reliable they are compared to the 7-series E65 which I've heard and read so many bad things about especially for the 2002/2003 early models? Anything specific to look out for with a used A8 D3, 2003/2004 model year?. The 3.0 was a good car for me, just found it too rev happy so I tunned the ECU and it was a rocket ship but not a 42. SF> Thanks nile. . I was wondering if this was really something truly stunning. I have seen one 3.0L with it fitted for sale. So it could just be that it needs a top up? The suspension also looked fine, and no options seemed to be greyed out in the MMI. Can you still drive the car if the air system fails? It's recently had the check in the book which says 'every 40,000 miles' I believe, which was something to do with the gearbox. I thought it said fluid. Unfortunately I can't drive it. It's a trade-in at my partner's work, and I'm not insured to drive it (and neither is my partner) - those are just the rules unfortunately. It's the risk you take with a trade-in I guess (Audi dealership). It is £2000 though. At 2 grand it's pretty much disposable. Just drive it till it dies (assuming you don't mind driving round in a scruffy car) then weigh it in. At this point it's not worth fixing unless you can do it yourself with used parts. Any trip to the stealer will manifest a bill far more than it's worth. And if the air suspension packs up you can't continue to drive it as the car ends up on the bump stops with no suspension.
